Ogwen Bridge is a substantial one-arched structure which conducts the main road across the pretty little mountain river, the Ogwen. This river, though small, is very picturesque, and most interesting to the geologist, as it flows through the beautiful Nant Ffrancon, or "vale of beavers," which many years ago was the bed of a glacier, to which the marked and scarred rocks in the valley bear ample witness.

Llyn Idwal lies in an elevated position, 1,200 feet above sea level, amid scenery which can only be described as the wildest and most bleak in Wales. It is situated in a hollow among the mountains, which was formed thousands of years ago by glacial action, its shores in some parts being most precipitous. Tradition has it that a certain Prince Idwal was drowned here by his foster-father, and in consequence no bird would fly across its waters.
